Introduction

In the context of the modern world, politics and science are closely intertwined. The modern world is characterized by a division of scientific labour, where scientific knowledge is produced and distributed by specialists in various fields. This has led to a growing concern about the relationship between politics and science, and how this relationship affects the production and use of scientific knowledge.

The Vocation Lectures

The Vocation Lectures are a series of lectures delivered by the sociologist Max Weber in 1919, just months before he died of pneumonia. The lectures were given at the University of Münster and were intended for students of law and economics. The lectures discuss the relationship between politics and science, and the nature of modernity.

The lectures are divided into three main parts:

- Part I: The Vocation of the Scholar
  - The concept of the modern world
  - The division of scientific labour
  - The fundamental nature and place of the modern world

- Part II: The Vocation of a Thinker
  - The nature of modernity
  - The relationship between politics and science

- Part III: The Vocation of a Practitioner
  - The role of politics in modern society
  - The relationship between politics and science

The lectures conclude with a substantial essay on the current significance of the lecture, which discusses its relevance to the modern world and the ongoing debate about the relationship between politics and science.

The lectures are a valuable resource for students of political science, sociology, and the history of ideas. They provide insight into the intellectual and political landscape of the early 20th century, and the challenges faced by those who sought to understand and shape the modern world.

The lectures are available in a variety of formats, including as a printed book, an audiobook, and a digital copy. They are widely regarded as a classic work of political and intellectual history.

In 1919, just months before he died unexpectedly of pneumonia, the sociologist Max Weber published two important lectures in the form of a series of essays. The lectures, which are now known as the "Vocation Lectures," were intended for students of law and economics and were intended to serve as a basis for the Modern Sociology course that was being taught at the University of Münster.

The lessons offered by these lectures are as relevant today as they were in the early 20th century. They explore the nature of modernity, the relationship between politics and science, and the challenges faced by those who sought to understand and shape the modern world.
